Section C

Special to The Dallas Morning News: Associated Press

They know the ins and outs of computers all too well. Comsec founders include (from left): Robert Cupps, Chris Goggans and Scott Chasin.

HACKERS, INC.

Would you hire some of the nation's most notorious hackers to design your computer security?

By Bill Marvel
Staff Writer of The Dallas Morning News

HOUSTON — You come home at the end of the day and realize that some stranger has been prowling around in your house. Whoever it was helped himself to a bowl of your porridge. He sat in your favorite chair and listened to your CDs. He took a nap in your bed. Then he left, locking the door behind him.

A day or two later, a guy shows up, identifies himself as a reformed burglar and offers to show you how to make your house burglar-proof.

Should you hire him?

This is the question that computer security managers will be asking themselves when the salesman from Comsec Data Security comes calling.

The purpose of the Houston-based company, which was incorporated just three weeks ago, is to help corporations and other computer users keep spies, criminals and other intruders out of their data systems.

Three of the four founders are former members of the Legion of Doom, the notorious band of computer hackers that for almost two years was the object of a wide-ranging federal investigation into computer crime. Just the kind of people Comsec wants to keep out of its clients' computers.

"When we secure a system, we're going to secure it so that we can't get into it ourselves," says Scott Chasin, one of the company's founders.

The three had been talking about starting a computer security company even before the Legion of Doom got into hot water with the government.

"None of us wanted to still be hacking when we're 30 years old," says Mr. Chasin, who is 21. Hacking is a young man's game.

Hackers are to computers what hobos are to trains: They like to take free rides in other people's computer systems.

Give a hacker access to a computer terminal, a modem (a device for linking computers via telephone lines) and enough time, and he can worm his way into almost any system and rummage around the database unchallenged. Riding the worldwide telecommunications network, a hacker can leapfrog from system to system, "visiting" private corporations, universities, government agencies, even military facilities, to collect access codes, operating instructions, personal information and trade secrets.

Comsec's edge: Thinking like a hacker

Mostly, hackers say, they do it for the sheer fun of getting away with it, of boldly going where no other hacker has gone before.

"We like beating the system," says Mr. Chasin. "That's the underlying goal of hackers."

But sometimes hackers make mischief, leaving behind calling cards to show where they've been, or altering or stealing data. And occasionally very destructive hackers — called crackers — will trash a system, planting computer "viruses" or "bombs" that go off later, erasing data and causing millions of dollars in damage.

Comsec's founders say they never did any harm — and they were never charged with any crime — but the Legion of Doom's notoriety has made some in the computer industry understandably suspicious of the fledgling firm and its creators.

"I'm not saying they're not honest or wouldn't do a good job," says Stephen T. Irwin, vice president of data communications for Millidyne, Inc., a Raleigh, N.C., telecommunications firm.

"The problem is, can they get over that handle, 'hacker'? I don't think a lot of banks will be giving them jobs."

Although several Legion members in Atlanta went to jail as a result of the federal investigation, none of Comsec's founders was ever arrested or indicted, according to Mr. Chasin. (In an unrelated incident, one founder, Ken Shulman, 21, pleaded no contest to misdemeanor charges of credit card fraud two years ago.)

But one of the founders, Chris Goggans, says that Secret Service agents did show up at his Austin apartment one day last March armed with a search warrant. They seized a bag of connection cables, a modem and a poster he bought in a West End souvenir shop, says Mr. Goggans.

According to the warrant, the agents were investigating the theft by hackers of operating instructions for the telephone company's 911 emergency system, the service that allows telephone users to summon firefighters and police. The warrant also alleged that Mr. Goggans was running a service to decode secret computer passwords for other hackers.

Mr. Goggans says he was merely operating a computer bulletin board being used by other Legion of Doom members to pass information.

He does, however, proudly admit to being a hacker.

"This is what I'd been doing since elementary school," he says. "I've been testing corporate security and exploring computer systems half my life."

Now 22, he says he paid for his first computer, an Atari 40, by mowing lawns. "I was 11 or 12, and the youngest hacker anybody had ever seen."

"I thought it was neat that you could sit in your home and use your computer to talk to computers elsewhere."

In 1984, a legendary hacker who went by the name of Lex Luthor — Superman's old nemesis — invited Mr. Goggans to join an elite new group of renegade hackers called the Legion of Doom. (All hackers employ a handle; Mr. Goggans hacked under the name Eric Bloodaxe; Scott Chasin was Doc Holliday.)

Shortly afterward, Mr. Chasin and Ken Shulman joined the Legion.

A favorite Legion of Doom target was the sprawling telephone network, a vulnerable system since practically everything is done by computer and all computers are linked. But the group also is said to have breached security on a number of corporate computer systems around the country.

Mr. Goggans — Eric Bloodaxe — denies that the Legion ever deliberately damaged a computer system, something, he says, that would have run against the hacker's code.

"The only significant damage I can recall was accidental," he says. "We once froze a system when we were running some kind of utility." (Translation: Hackers ran a program that overburdened a system, causing it to shut down.)

"But there was a vast potential for damage," he concedes.

That is exactly why corporations need the kind of services Comsec can provide, says Robert Cupps, 24, the company's fourth founder and a former Atlanta securities trader. The only member of Comsec who was never a hacker, Mr. Cupps oversees the company's management, finance and sales operations.

The idea is that Comsec's experts will act as what is called a "tiger team," hacking their way into a client's computer systems (with the client's permission, of course), identifying the flaws that allowed them to slip in, and helping design a system to plug the leaks.

Mr. Chasin claims Comsec's members racked up an 80 percent success rate in their hacking days.

"We've had 11 to 12 years at this, 14 hours a day," he says. "The established security people, they weren't hackers. That's why we're unique. We understand how the hacker hacks, how he thinks. You don't get that from bookstores."

At least one expert agrees. "I have the greatest respect for the techies who call themselves hackers," says Kenneth P. Weiss, founder, chairman and chief technical officer of Security Dynamics, a Cambridge, Mass., maker of data security equipment. "Some of the greatest innovations in computer technology and software have come from hackers."

"If reasonably respectable hackers have gotten together offering their services as a tiger team, my guess is they will be a lot more effective than the regular tiger teams that just go for the weaknesses others have already uncovered."

Even so, some computer security experts are skeptical, suggesting that the former Legion of Doom members prove themselves before being allowed to poke around somebody else's computer system.

"Would I hire a safe breaker to be a security guy at my bank?" was the way John Blackley of Capital Holding Corp. in Louisville, Ky., put it to a reporter for the newsletter Computerworld. "If they stayed straight for five to 10 years, I might reconsider."

"We're fresh from the underground," counters Chris Goggans. "If we waited long enough to prove we've gone straight, we'd lose our edge."

"This is what I've geared myself to do," he says. "I've been testing corporate security and exploring corporate computer systems for half my life."

"If you can find a problem, you can find a cure."
